Located within north Kent, Gillingham is the eastern most of the Medway towns of Strood, Rochester and Chatham. Gillingham's town centre – the focus of this project – is at the heart of the town, close to the railway station and surrounded by residential development, but within a short distance of the bigger town centre at Chatham. It serves a local function, predominantly attracting people from close by on foot.

Located on the northern side of Gillingham, at the riverside, are two out-of-centre retail and leisure hubs, which are likely to attract people from distance due to their size, proximity to the river, accessibility and the range of activities.

To the southwest, Chatham town centre is the main centre in the area, offering a higher order of shops and services. Combined with this, Chatham has a good food and beverage offer and an established evening economy based around a range of activities, including a theatre and tingo hall. The area between Chatham town centre and Gillingham town centre is occupied by the Great Lines Heritage Park, a significant open space protected as a conservation area and wrapped up in the maritime history of the area.

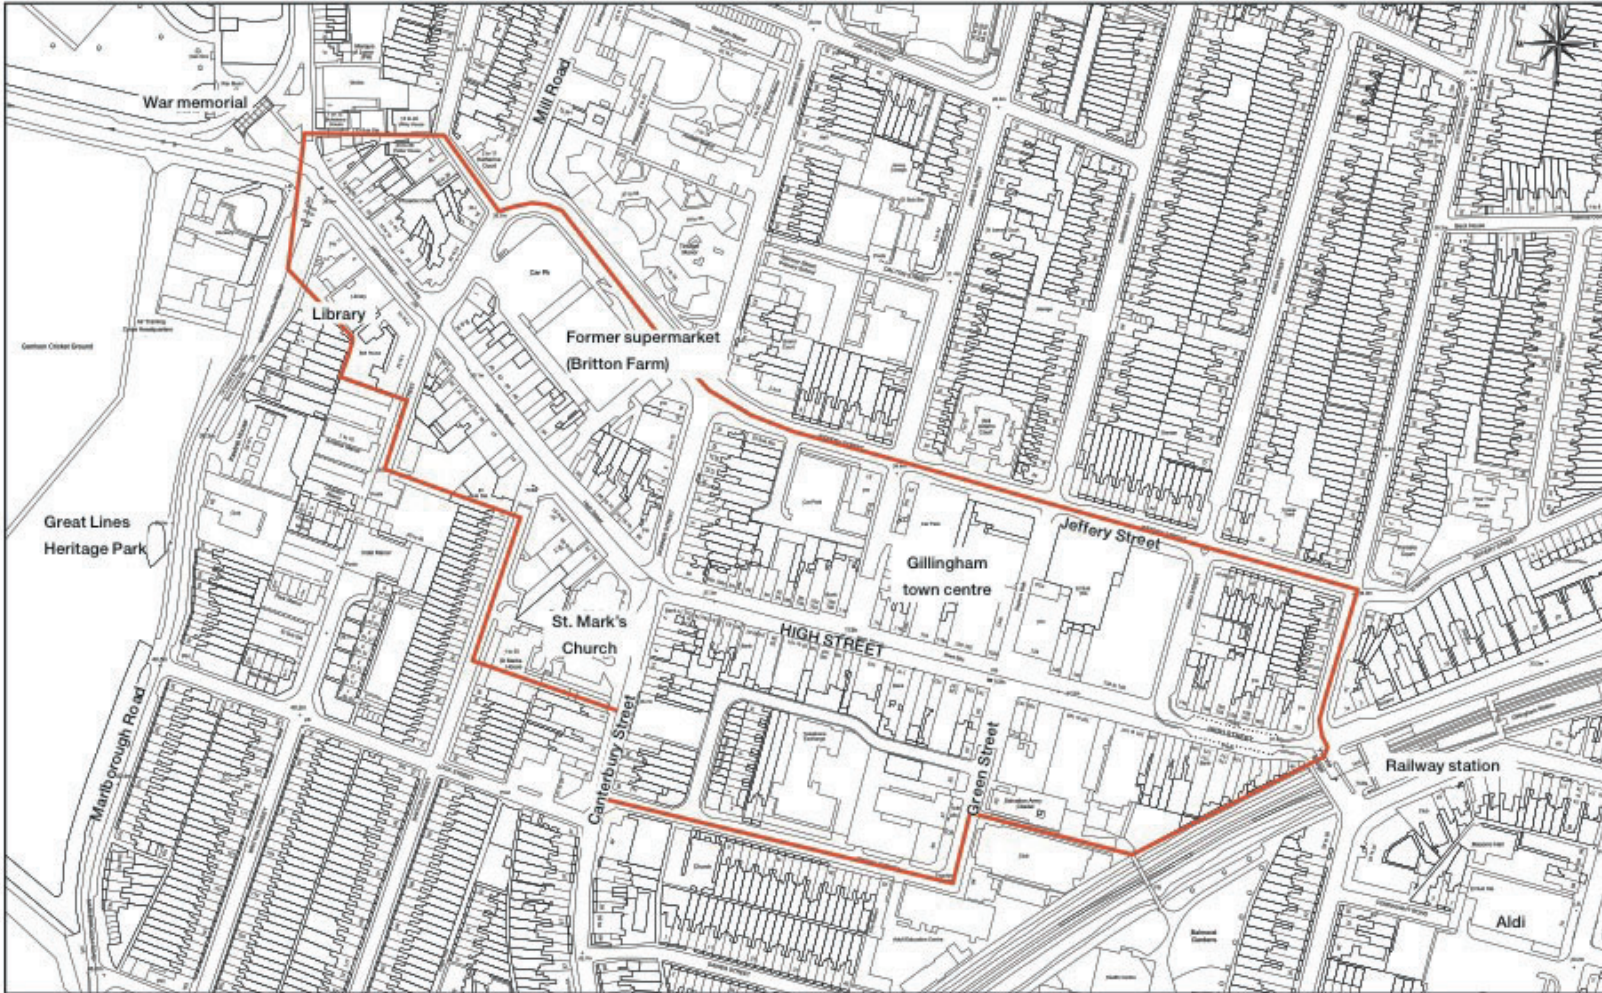

Gillingham town centre has a railway station, which offers access directly into the high street, the town centre is well connected with surrounding streets, particularly on the northern side; connections to the south are more constrained due to the railway. It is therefore accessible by a range of means to residents and visitors to the town. In addition, the town centre has the potential to attract students from the nearby educational institutions to the north and may also benefit from being close to significant neighbouring land uses including Medway Maritime Hospital, Gillingham FC stadium.

In terms of its proximity to other centres, Gillingham's core retail area is around 15 mins away from one of the northern leisure hubs. The connection with Chatham town centre is encouraged by Great Lines Heritage Park which facilitates pedestrian links between the two local hearts.

Gillingham's town centre Planning Policy

Retail Designation 5c: Gillingham District Centre

- Town centre tightly defined around the retail functions
- Defines primary and secondary areas
- Acknowledged the need for town centres to have other services and functions within it – but not reflected in the boundary

Gillingham

Engagement and consultation

- desire for a better town centre – more shops, greater diversity and more independent shops
- but people used the town centre for much more than retail and valued the other services
 - the leisure centre
 - the library
 - the health centre and play space
 - food and drink
- dispersal and decline of retail in the town centre threatens to take those other services with it
- it also undermines the effectiveness, or reason to invest in, of other forms of travel
- those more vulnerable to decline were at risk of becoming more isolated
- the accessibility of the town centre and the range of services – beyond the retail functions – creates critical mass and linked trips

Key factors

Summary of the main points from Gillingham

- Think about the town centre more broadly than retail
- Widen the boundary to make linkages between retail and non-retail uses
- Support non-retail assets, address their issues
- Define character areas and nurture uses where they are establishing / established
- Think about a broad demography; who is using the centre, at what times and why
- Create good linkages between areas (public realm / wayfinding)
- Homes in the town centre
